

What the Stars Promise for Baby Astor's Half Brother

The Interesting Fortune Predicted for the Titanic Widow's Second Son—His Misfortunes in Love, His Struggles for Supremacy, His Triumph at Last Over the Power of the Astor Millions

The Horoscope of Baby Dick.

By Professor Sothnos Letillier.

HERE occurred on Wednesday, April 11, a birth fraught with important future consequences to this country. That afternoon a baby boy was born to Mrs. Madeleine Force Dick, the widow of Colonel John Jacob Astor, who was one of the notable victims of the Titanic disaster on April 15, 1912.

Here, to begin, was a most curious and interesting condition. Mrs. Dick's second son was given her on practically the same date that her first husband was taken from her. What say the stars as to the meaning of this coincidence?

Again, consider the problems in Mme. Astor-Dick's own home. There, growing, is the five-year-old son of herself and Colonel Astor. John Jacob he is named after his father. He is an Astor through and through, with all that it implies of social position. He has a fortune in his own right—one that cannot be taken away from him as his mother's fortune was taken from her when she decided to leave the tents of the Astors for that of her new husband. The Dicks are estimable, well born, moderately wealthy folk, but no one will pretend that they rank with Astors in the curious lists of American aristocracy.

Indeed, little John Jacob, when he grows up, will be able to enter and be welcomed through doors that his own mother will not be able to pass.

And this will be equally true of little half-brother Dick, just born. There will be a household in which one boy will have great wealth, the highest social position, entree everywhere, quite like a royal prince. And side by side with him will be his little brother, not rich, comparatively, and certainly with none of the Astor social rights. What will come from all this? What do the stars say?

The stars say that from this combination of John Jacob Astor and his half brother will be created the future financial rulers of America. They say that without the other each would be more or less ineffective. But that together, one nullifying the faults and supplementing the other, the half brothers will conquer the world, as long as they stand together.

First, let us consider the horoscope—an extraordinary one. Let me explain that the meridian of the figure given herewith represents the "line of fire," or the avenue through which the ego reincarnates. It reveals through the specific point of the Zodiac which it intersects somewhat of the soul's status, or the individuality thus brought into manifestation. In the transverse beam is portrayed the Personality, and these two in combination constitute the Microcosmic Cross.

The venerable Saturn frowns down from the apex of this figure, not so much with "malice prepense" as a criterion of the older soulhood of this child. This child comes from a Whenceward that would justify a lively sense of awe. Could one but peep behind the veil to a very distant scene of previous earth activity one might see him clothed in vestments of consecrated service as philosopher or priest, ascetic or recluse, treading the ways of counsel and meditation. How this priestly atmosphere, sweeping out of an Oriental past, will be clarified by contact with modern civilization is what makes the horoscope of the little son of Mr. and Mrs. Dick of such unusual interest.

Curiously, too, are the lives of Vincent Astor and of the first Mrs. Astor blended with those of these two sons of Madaleine Force!

are seen in the character of little John Jacob Astor. He is, and always will be, pleasure loving, adventurous, strongly inclined to luxury. The Dick child, though sedate by virtue of the higher and remoter side of his nature given him by his previous incarnation, is compelled by the very reason of this to seek his polar opposite. He finds this in his half-brother.

The first cementing of their future unity happens in the Dick boy's sixth year, when the stars show that his brother will save him from the attack of some animal—I should infer a mad dog. Thereafter they live together uneventfully until 1930 when Dick in his turn saves John Jacob from drowning, a fate which also threatens Vincent Astor. Young Dick will be precocious and will mature far more quickly than his more ornamental brother. He will early see the value of the combination of his own brains and talents with John Jacob's social position and wealth. And he will cause his half-brother also to see this.

Women figure largely and unhappily in his life. Although possessed of an inherent magnetic capacity to attract, he is repeatedly the victim of feminine insincerity. He will marry in his twenty-eighth year. His marriage will bring great social and financial advantage, but the union will lack in both felicity and permanency. A second, if indeed not a third, marital experience is denoted. In this respect he makes amends for the monastic or celibate predilections of his former existence.

This same Saturn plays similarly a havoc in his domestic life, as it did in that of the mother, though not necessarily identical as to episode, but with the destructive tendencies accentuated by the presence of Mars in the marriage section. There is a sort of astral primogeniture that manifests in the horoscopes of children by which one may read much of the scrolls of a parent. There is a closer sympathy for the father than for the mother shown in the birth figure, for Saturn herein again registers against her as it did a few years back in its premonition of the Titanic disaster. As shown in the child's horoscope this unpleasant augury culminates in relation to the mother in January, 1920, or very shortly before, and in the way of a very critical illness, in which her life will be despaired of, at which period both his Sun and Moon come into affliction with Saturn in the parental quarter of the heavens.

But although he weds in his twenty-eighth year, he will, when he is twenty-three, be violently in love with the same girl with whom his half-brother is in love and who is destined to become John Jacob Astor's wife. Here will come the greatest danger that menaces the future of the half-brothers. The girl the two love will first promise herself to Dick. This will be before she has met young Astor. When she meets the brother of the man to whom she has plighted herself, she will realize her mistake. There will be a dramatic and dangerous situation between the two men, but Dick's control of his own spirit will solve the problem for them and he will give up his love to John.

At the age of twenty-eight he and his brother have already become powers in the financial world of America. They are now destined to come into sharp conflict with the greater Astor wealth controlled by Vincent. Vincent, although kindly disposed to his own half-brother, is swayed by the powerful interests that make up his group. Just as he is about to ruin the two his then aged mother, Mrs. Ava Astor, will step in and save them. This action on her part will cost a large part of Vincent's fortune and make this group of the Astor wealth forever secondary in business power in the United States.

This much the stars say and, alas, more clearly than anything do they point that he will never be happy through his heart but through his head, and that, although he will have many millions and power he will leave none behind to enjoy them.
